Context The black mamba Dendroaspis polylepis is due to its extremely toxic venom one of the most dangerous snake species in Sub Saharan Africa. A D

polylepis bite is a medical emergency and requires adequate action to prevent severe complications Black Mambas are shy animals and prefer to stay away from human contact. Human population expansion into its habitat could therefore constitute a potential threat to this species

However the extent of its range throughout much of Africa means that this should not be considered a serious threat Abstract The black mamba Dendroaspis polylepis ranks consistently as one of the most revered snakes in sub Saharan Africa

It has potent neurotoxic venom and envenomation results in rapid onset and severe clinical manifestations We present the case of a male adult who was admitted to an emergency department after having sustained envenomation from a black mamba Dendroaspis polylepis

According to the available history a single fang hooked his right index finger post venom extraction The black mamba pictured is aggressive bad tempered and lightning fast

Because its habitat overlaps with human communities this highly venomous snake represents a grave threat to people Unveiling the nature of black mamba Dendroaspis polylepis venom 4 through venomomics and antivenom immunoprofiling Identification of key 5 toxin targets for antivenom development Distribution of the black mamba Dendroaspis polylepis in Africa

Each filled circle indicates reports of one or more specimens of D. polylepis. For the sake of visual clarity we have not included all records from east and central Africa where D. polylepis has a wide distribution.
