David Bowie shattered the boundaries of possibility reinventing himself endlessly and reshaping the very concept of what music and identity could be Written by David Bowie and Iggy Pop ChinaGirl began as a piece called Borderline that the two came up with one night residing at the Chteau d Hrouville in Hrouville France during the sessions for Pop s debut solo album The Idiot In 1976 David Bowie and Iggy Pop co wroteChinaGirlwhile in France just prior to their Berlin Era

The song itself originally appeared on Iggys 1977 album The Idiot which was co written Watch theChinaGirlmusic video by David Bowie on Apple Music In the 2018 documentary American Valhalla Pop revealed that ChinaGirl was indeed about a real woman it was somebody s wife that Pop got to know

In this scene Josh Homme is reading a typed note from Pop that mentions a French singer as being the husband of this woman Despite being one of Bowies best known songs ChinaGirl owes much of its success to two other musicians

Iggy Pop wrote the lyrics to Bowies music in 1976 while Nile Rodgers turned it into a modern pop classic at the end of 1982 At its core ChinaGirl explores the intersection of personal relationships and broader societal issues

The song reflects Bowies ability to weave layers of meaning into his work using a romantic relationship as a lens to examine identity cultural appropriation and the complexities of love The lyrics of ChinaGirl were partly inspired by Iggys brief relationship with Kuelan Nguyen a Vietnamese woman he met in Paris

The song touches on themes of obsession cultural disconnection and power dynamics My littleChinagirlYou shouldn t mess with me I ll ruin everything you are You know it I ll give you television I ll give you eyes of blue I ll give you a man who wants to rule the world And when I get excited My littleChinagirlsays Oh baby just you shut your mouth
