May 20 2021 The sections of a lab report can vary between scientific fields and course requirements but they usually contain the purpose, methods and findings of a lab experiment. Your lab report should primarily showcase your own work, analysis and understanding of the experiment.

Use sources as supplementary evidence or background information. This should be detailed enough that another person could read it and repeat your procedures and hopefully obtain the same results. Therefore, you should include all important elements of your activities, including timeframe, number of subjects, any equipment used, methods of measurement and so on. At its core, a lab report is a detailed record of an experiment, typically broken down into several sections including the introduction, methods, results, discussion and conclusion. Include information about methods, temperature, concentration, how the data are expressed, sample size and any abbreviations.

Do not include any Results or Discussion in the legend. Sep 22 2025 This section simply lists in standard bibliographic format (APA Style) the resource materials that you used in doing the experiment and preparing the report.

Internet sources are not acceptable unless they are peer-reviewed journal articles. Nov 12 2025 Now that you have completed an experiment and have collected all of the necessary information in your lab notebook and any supplementary data from analytical instruments, you need to write up your results in a lab report.
