What if you never decide to self report AP scores whenever they're not that well enough 2s and 1s in the case of applying to the ivy league or top schools would this be considered suspicious or would it hurt your application? Sep 17 2024

That's because they want students who will not only master the material taught in their college courses but also earn high grades in them

The two aren't always tightly coupled. That is you can master the material and still earn a poor grade As with many college admissions related questions the answer to this question is It depends

However as a general rule your AP exams scores aren't going to be a major make or break factor in whether you get into a college or not Feb 13 2025 Previously AP exams scores were relatively unimportant however when the College Board discontinued SAT subject tests in 2021 top colleges shifted their focus from SAT subject tests scores to AP exams scores Apr 22 2025 AP scores can support college applications but course rigor and grades matter more

Learn how AP exams fit into holistic admissions at selective schools Jul 24 2021 TL DR AP scores are somewhat important for admissions. Having relatively good scores can enhance your application and can distinguish yourself from your peers

Not taking them will NOT directly hurt you but will indirectly contrast you somewhat negatively to your peers Feb 16 2024 With the wide variety of materials you're submitting AP test scores rank pretty low on the list of major factors

The best way to think about and utilize AP scores is to highlight a particular passion or interest in a certain subject.
